

From: Chohanmotor@aol.com@inetgw
To: Microsoft ATR
Date: 1/26/02 1:59pm
Subject: Hi

I would say that both United States and Microsoft are right at their own sides. I say this because Microsoft wants to be popular like any other company's goal would be so it sells its software almost in all pc's. They want people to use their internet browser too so they made their OS's like that the people has to accept the agreement to install Their browser too in order to get their OS installed. It's kind of enforcement that they're doing but I think that any company who would like to be popular and rich will definitely do that. Now on the other hand, United States is right that Microsoft shouldn't do like that to sell their internet browsers like that because like that it'll be a monopoly. No other company can sell their product, for example Netscape. They want to sell their software too. So I think that the case is good in my opinion because If you put yourself in either Microsoft side or United States side you would do the same thing that they're doing. Thanks